Mr. POWELL,
The Publication of the following Verses in your next Gazette, will oblige, Yours, &c. CLIO.

The PRODIGAL SON.

Ah! what is Man, when his own Wish prevails!
How rash, how swift, to plunge himself in Ill;
Proud of his Power, and boundless in his Will.
DRYDEN.

THE Bard attempts to picture human Woe,
And paint those Feelings none but Parents know.
Indulgent Muse, will Strains poetic suit,
To pencil Grief, most eloquent when mute?
Or can those Transports be by Pen express'd,
That glow within the happy Parent's Breast?
Let me with modest Diffidence pursue,
The tender Theme, the Moral still in View.
I sing the Man, with Scripture for my Guide,
Whose Care two darling Offsprings did divide;
The pleasing Prop on which his Age did trust,
Till Nature's sinking Sun should set in Dust.
To each he gave a just impartial Share,
Of all his Substance, all his Wants would spare:
Studious to shelter Shrubs his Hands did raise,
From chilling adverse Blasts in future Days.
Whilst Man with Ardour Happiness pursues,
How short his Foresight, circumscrib'd his Views!
Misfortunes blight, the Basis Hope destroys,
And nips the coming Harvest of his Joys.
The junior Branch, on which his Years reclin'd,
E'er Reason's Bud had blossom'd in his Mind,
Shook off Restraint—each filial Virtue slept,
In Duty's Bounds the Youth no longer kept;
But liv'd at Large, the Guardian of himself,
Intent on Means to dissipate his Wealth.
Deaf to Reproof—Advice of Friends disown'd;
Beneath the Axe, the towering Timbers groan'd;
Rich Lands were mortgag'd, vast Possessions sold;
His Cattle slaughter'd—Vineyards turn'd to Gold.
Elate with Pride, he now resolv'd to roam,
Left his paternal Seat, his native Home;
(Slave to the reigning Follies of the Times)
Ideal Joys to seek in distant Climes:
Launch'd in a Sea of riotous Excess,
He fondly thought the Road to Happiness.
To Prudence dead, Intemperance held the Reins,
With baneful Progress fill'd the circling Veins;
His splendid Vest, the Clue of Art explor'd,
Voluptuous Dishes crown'd the costly Board:
Health fled her Seat, his Cheeks no longer bloom'd,
And what his Harlot's spar'd, the Dice consum'd.
While thus the fancy'd flowery Path he trod,
Want wav'd, with meagre Palm, her Iron Rod.
Withdrawn the fable Shrouds of Reason's Light,
And Ruin, rob'd with Horror, glar'd in Sight:
Reflection gave corrosive Torments Birth,
That damp'd the wanton Sallies of his Mirth.
His Fortune Ship-wreck'd, 'twas too late to shun,
For Friendship's Frown confirm'd he was undone.
Strip'd of the sumptuous Trappings of his Pride,
To Hope, that soothing Maid! no more ally'd,
What Anguish rack'd the mental Throw of Care,
And sunk his sorrow'd Soul in deep Despair;
He, who till then on choicest Dainties fed,
And sought soft Slumbers on a downy Bed;
Who bask'd in Fortune's full meridian Ray,
And smoothly pass'd thro' each revolving Day.
Whose Dress a silken gorgeous Train displayed,
Whose Nod, superfluous servile Slaves obey'd.
Behold with Grief, a total Change ensue,
The clouded Prospect blacken'd on his View;
Humbled by swift successive Shafts of Woe,
That taught the contrite Youth himself to know.
An abject Garb supply'd his rich Attire,
He fed with Swine amidst their Dirt and Mire,
And he, who once abounded, toil'd for Hire.
Soon as Aurora's Blush proclaim'd the Day,
The Herd he watch'd till Sol's departing Ray;
Then stretch'd on Straw, Relief in Sleep he sought,
To veil his Cares, and blunt the Edge of Thought;
While thus he groan'd beneath the grievous Yoke,
Conviction loos'd his Tongue, he sigh'd and spoke,
I'll seek the Man who rear'd my drawing Pow'rs,
Whose Care sat brooding o'er my infant Hours;
Perhaps, when all my Errors are confest,
Pity may plead within the Parent's Breast;
His Arms may yet receive a wretched Son,
Who, when he fled his Counsel, was undone;
Prostrate I'll fall, my secret Faults disclose,
And ask his Peace to mitigate my Woes.
Prompted by Hope, that bid his Fears abate,
He sought the friendly hospitable Gate;
Nor sought in vain! his penitential Cries,
Obtain'd the long lost, now wish'd for Prize.
See the fond Father, silver'd o'er with Years,
Gaze with Delight, while Nature woke in Tears,
Breathe balmy Blessings on his darling Boy,
Source of his Grief and Center of his Joy.
That Son, whose Loss with Tears he oft deplor'd,
He saw with Rapture to his Arms restor'd.
Swift from his Brow, the hov'ring Gloom to chace,
That plow'd deep Furrows in his aged Face.
Doubt, Joy, Surprize, in Turns tumultuous reign,
He wept, then view'd, and kiss'd, and wept again.
Chear'd by the Sounds, that bid his Hope aspire,
The penitential Youth bespoke his Sire:
My secret Sins and Penitence are known,
To God, whose Mercy fills the radiant Throne;
My Substance spent, I own myself to blame,
Stript by my Crimes of every filial Claim.
Then sighing paus'd, of Utterance bereav'd,
'Till Grief, in Floods, his throbbing Soul reliev'd.
Frantic with Joy, the venerable Man,
Straight to confirm Forgiveness, thus began:
Bring forth the splendid Vest, the rich Array,
And let his Hand a brilliant Ring display:
Go kill the fatted Calf, let Mirth abound,
That this bless'd Day may be with Pleasure crown'd:
For now, my Son, from Bonds of Vice set free,
Lives to his GOD, to Virtue, and to Me.

An ESSAY on PHISIOGNOMY.

HOWEVER vain and ridiculous the presumption of those people may appear, who pretend to tell fortunes, and prognosticate future events, from the arrangement of cards, and the appearance of coffee-grounds, as they are whirled around, and settled on the sides of the cup; we will not scruple to affirm, that the genuine art of Phisiognomy, or Metoposcopy, is not beneath the consideration, and even the study of a Philosopher: For, though it will not teach us to prognosticate particular events, it must be of considerable service in helping us to discern the predominant passions, the vices, the views, and, in a word, the natural disposition of those with whom they may have connections and concerns. This inference we draw from a thorough conviction, that the looks of men in general are strongly affected, and even modelled, by particular habits of thinking; and that different characters of the mind are usually distinguished by particular conformations and complexions of the body. A subtile Italian politician, famous for discovering the hidden sentiments of the heart, even when wrapped in the thickest cloak of dissimulation, used carefully to survey the features of the person whose thoughts he wanted to develope, and mimic their disposition in his own face, an expedient that never failed to suggest the ideas, which corresponded with that cast of countenance. Every body has heard the instance of the phisiognomist Zopyrus, who having examined the face of Socrates, pronounced him a dunce and a libertine. The artist being ridiculed by those who were well acquainted with this sage's wisdom and continence, Socrates reprehended them for their mirth, and owned he was naturally such as the phisiognomist had declared; but that he had corrected the vices of his nature by the exercise of reason and hard study. Another professor of metoposcopy having viewed a portrait of Hippocrates, pronounced nearly the same sentence against the father of medicine, and was in danger of being roughly handled by his disciples, until they were undeceived by their master, who also had candour enough to acknowledge his own natural defects. Pliny, in mentioning the excellency of the painter Apelles, affirms, that he struck the likeness of men so exactly, that a phisiognomist by looking at them could discover the age of the persons represented, and even predict the number of years they had to live. John surnamed the FEARLESS, Duke of Burgundy, being taken prisoner in the battle of Nicopolis fought between the Imperialists and the Turks, was upon the brink of being put to death, by order of the victor Sultan Bajazet, when a Turkish phisiognomist saved his life by assuring the Sultan, that from an accurate inspection of the prisoner he could plainly perceive, that if John was dismissed, he would occasion a vast effusion of blood and many cruel wars among the Christians. This prediction, however, we must receive with some grains of allowance, though related as fact by Henterus in his Hist. of Burgundy. We are told by Paulus Jovius, that Antonio Tiberto, a native of Cesena, and a very famous phisiognomist, prognosticated to Guido Balneo, the great favourite of Pandulfo Malatesta, a tyrant of Arimini, that he would be deprived of life by an intimate friend of his own. He likewise warned Pandulpho, that he would be expelled from his country, and die in extreme misery. Both events happened according to the prediction; Guido was put to death by the tyrant, who, in his turn, died in exile, wretchedly poor, and abandoned by all the world. St. Gregory of Nazianzene, seeing Julian the apostate, when he was a young man, at Athens, after having attentively viewed his face and appearance, exclaimed, "O what mischief will that youth occasion to the Roman empire!" St. Charles of Borromeo payed such regard to the phisiognomy, that he would admit none into his family and service but persons of unblemished make and agreeable aspect, saying, "That beautiful souls generally dwelt in beautiful bodies." This general rule, however, is not without numerous exceptions. The Jesuit Nicetus being reputed the best phisiognomist, who hath committed his rules to writing, we shall specify some of them, for the entertainment of the curious; and every reader may compare them with the result of his own observations.

"A man of a sanguine or gay disposition, is distinguished by a fair smooth skin, large muscles, quick growth, agility, plentiful sweats, a florid complexion, red hair, pleasing aspect, regular features, a strong, clear, and agreeable regular tone of voice, a strong full pulse, sound and long sleeping, pleasing dreams of dancing, riding, or flying. His constitution is hot and moist; his health various; his life long. His virtues consist in meekness, affability, gratitude, and urbanity; the vices incident to this disposition are, loquacity, fickleness, breach of faith, lying, lust, and inconstancy. In point of genius, he is volatile, capricious, and averse to study.

"The choleric, or fiery disposition, is known by a lean habit, agility, a rigid fibre, dusky skin, short curled hair, small head, little eyes, quick pace, rough tongue, scanty secretion of spittle, a brown yellowish complexion, a quick, hasty voice, a vehement, hard frequent pulse, short and interrupted sleep, turbulent dreams of wars and quarrels. His constitution is hot and dry; his health good, and life of a reasonable length. His virtues consist in diligence, vigilance, and constancy. With respect to vices, he is irascible, quarrelsome, apt to indulge hatred, ambitious, boastful, importunate, impolite, invidious. His genius is keen, penetrating, and sagacious.

"The flegmatic disposition is attended with bulk, fulness, a great deal of spittle and mucus, but no drought, grey hairs betimes, small blood-vessels, slow digestion; a white, jolly, sleek, effeminate countenance; a sharp, quick, squeaking voice; a slow, deliberate, equal pulse; sweet, easy, long sleeps; dreams of water, or moist objects. His constitution is cold and moist, health indifferent, and life short. In point of virtue, he is meek, quiet, and inoffensive in conversation. As to vice, he is idle, slothful, luxurious, and impolite: and, with respect to genius, he is dull, and slow of comprehension.

"He that inherits a melancholic or terrene disposition has a small body, beardless, thin, dry rough skin, and hard bones; a grey, dusky, leaden, dejected countenance; a low, quivering, fearful voice; a slow, small, hard pulse, troubled sleep, melancholy dreams of the dead. His constitution is cold and dry; his health very bad, and his life of short duration. The virtues of this disposition are, fidelity, stability, and prudence; but this more remarkable in youth than in old age. The vices are sullen silence, avarice, obstinacy, and a suspicious temper. The genius is profound, persevering, and mature."

An ESSAY on PHISIOGNOMY.

HOWEVER vain and ridiculous the presumption of those people may appear, who pretend to tell fortunes, and prognosticate future events, from the arrangement of cards, and the appearance of coffee-grounds, as they are whirled around, and settled on the sides of the cup; we will not scruple to affirm, that the genuine art of Phisiognomy, or Metoposcopy, is not beneath the consideration, and even the study of a Philosopher: For, though it will not teach us to prognosticate particular events, it must be of considerable service in helping us to discern the predominant passions, the vices, the views, and, in a word, the natural disposition of those with whom they may have connections and concerns. This inference we draw from a thorough conviction, that the looks of men in general are strongly affected, and even modelled, by particular habits of thinking; and that different characters of the mind are usually distinguished by particular conformations and complexions of the body. A subtile Italian politician, famous for discovering the hidden sentiments of the heart, even when wrapped in the thickest cloak of dissimulation, used carefully to survey the features of the person whose thoughts he wanted to develope, and mimic their disposition in his own face, an expedient that never failed to suggest the ideas, which corresponded with that cast of countenance. Every body has heard the instance of the phisiognomist Zopyrus, who having examined the face of Socrates, pronounced him a dunce and a libertine. The artist being ridiculed by those who were well acquainted with this sage's wisdom and continence, Socrates reprehended them for their mirth, and owned he was naturally such as the phisiognomist had declared; but that he had corrected the vices of his nature by the exercise of reason and hard study. Another professor of metoposcopy having viewed a portrait of Hippocrates, pronounced nearly the same sentence against the father of medicine, and was in danger of being roughly handled by his disciples, until they were undeceived by their master, who also had candour enough to acknowledge his own natural defects. Pliny, in mentioning the excellency of the painter Apelles, affirms, that he struck the likeness of men so exactly, that a phisiognomist by looking at them could discover the age of the persons represented, and even predict the number of years they had to live. John surnamed the FEARLESS, Duke of Burgundy, being taken prisoner in the battle of Nicopolis fought between the Imperialists and the Turks, was upon the brink of being put to death, by order of the victor Sultan Bajazet, when a Turkish phisiognomist saved his life by assuring the Sultan, that from an accurate inspection of the prisoner he could plainly perceive, that if John was dismissed, he would occasion a vast effusion of blood and many cruel wars among the Christians. This prediction, however, we must receive with some grains of allowance, though related as fact by Henterus in his Hist. of Burgundy. We are told by Paulus Jovius, that Antonio Tiberto, a native of Cesena, and a very famous phisiognomist, prognosticated to Guido Balneo, the great favourite of Pandulfo Malatesta, a tyrant of Arimini, that he would be deprived of life by an intimate friend of his own. He likewise warned Pandulpho, that he would be expelled from his country, and die in extreme misery. Both events happened according to the prediction; Guido was put to death by the tyrant, who, in his turn, died in exile, wretchedly poor, and abandoned by all the world. St. Gregory of Nazianzene, seeing Julian the apostate, when he was a young man, at Athens, after having attentively viewed his face and appearance, exclaimed, "O what mischief will that youth occasion to the Roman empire!" St. Charles of Borromeo payed such regard to the phisiognomy, that he would admit none into his family and service but persons of unblemished make and agreeable aspect, saying, "That beautiful souls generally dwelt in beautiful bodies." This general rule, however, is not without numerous exceptions. The Jesuit Nicetus being reputed the best phisiognomist, who hath committed his rules to writing, we shall specify some of them, for the entertainment of the curious; and every reader may compare them with the result of his own observations.

"A man of a sanguine or gay disposition, is distinguished by a fair smooth skin, large muscles, quick growth, agility, plentiful sweats, a florid complexion, red hair, pleasing aspect, regular features, a strong, clear, and agreeable regular tone of voice, a strong full pulse, sound and long sleeping, pleasing dreams of dancing, riding, or flying. His constitution is hot and moist; his health various; his life long. His virtues consist in meekness, affability, gratitude, and urbanity; the vices incident to this disposition are, loquacity, fickleness, breach of faith, lying, lust, and inconstancy. In point of genius, he is volatile, capricious, and averse to study.

"The choleric, or fiery disposition, is known by a lean habit, agility, a rigid fibre, dusky skin, short curled hair, small head, little eyes, quick pace, rough tongue, scanty secretion of spittle, a brown yellowish complexion, a quick, hasty voice, a vehement, hard frequent pulse, short and interrupted sleep, turbulent dreams of wars and quarrels. His constitution is hot and dry; his health good, and life of a reasonable length. His virtues consist in diligence, vigilance, and constancy. With respect to vices, he is irascible, quarrelsome, apt to indulge hatred, ambitious, boastful, importunate, impolite, invidious. His genius is keen, penetrating, and sagacious.

"The flegmatic disposition is attended with bulk, fulness, a great deal of spittle and mucus, but no drought, grey hairs betimes, small blood-vessels, slow digestion; a white, jolly, sleek, effeminate countenance; a sharp, quick, squeaking voice; a slow, deliberate, equal pulse; sweet, easy, long sleeps; dreams of water, or moist objects. His constitution is cold and moist, health indifferent, and life short. In point of virtue, he is meek, quiet, and inoffensive in conversation. As to vice, he is idle, slothful, luxurious, and impolite: and, with respect to genius, he is dull, and slow of comprehension.

"He that inherits a melancholic or terrene disposition has a small body, beardless, thin, dry rough skin, and hard bones; a grey, dusky, leaden, dejected countenance; a low, quivering, fearful voice; a slow, small, hard pulse, troubled sleep, melancholy dreams of the dead. His constitution is cold and dry; his health very bad, and his life of short duration. The virtues of this disposition are, fidelity, stability, and prudence; but this more remarkable in youth than in old age. The vices are sullen silence, avarice, obstinacy, and a suspicious temper. The genius is profound, persevering, and mature."
